> COMMUNICATED. MEANNESS-BY J. B. JOHNSON.

placed, here and there, amid the dark waters of the trackless ocean of existence, to direct the life-voyage of man, are removed, he has but little for boastfulness; for when left to follow the dictates of self-love, he soon presents a sad spectacle of a deformed object, distorted by the power of an unrestrained licentionsness, and dashes on his careless career with more than brute vehemence. His better nature becomes as pitiless as his worst cravings are relentless, and of all animals, he grows most terrible and destructive to his kind. Demoralization develops his craven spirit, and the wildest extravagance possesses his mind. Night and day, he seeks, with savage vigilance, an opportunity to mar or destroy the welfare of his fellow-creatures; and of all animated creation, manifests the greatest inclination to prey upon his genus. An irrepresible desire to wrong his fellow-beings, keeps him constantly scheming to make others instrumental in conducing to the maintainance of the estimate which he forms of himself, and, notwithstanding his superiority as an animal, he has stampand reiterated appeals of civilization tame his wilder animose, he becomes somewhat subdued, but never entirely reclaimed, and contents himself in gaining by petty cunning, those advantages, which, in a state of nature, he would acquire by physical force. This cunning is the butes that belong to the machination which is indicative of it. The mind has not yet attained the capacity to discern perfection; and the predominant Dyed. motive in man's nature to be mean, has given rise to the multitude of laws which regulate the business and social pursuits of life. The necessity of such laws indicates that deception is the ruling sentiment of the human breast, and that one man must force another to be honorable, rather than leave it to chance that he will be truthful in his promises, and just in his conduct. Charity and patience do much towards lulling the complaints of honor, but experience proclaims that the less confidence one reposes in the voluntary virtue of another, the better it will be for the good of his health, morality and property; for many an individual has regretted that he did not guard himself against the baseness of his fellow-man, while no one has ever yet repined that he adopted those means which were likely to protect him wary in his daily transactions, will be the most successful in eluding the many perplexities that in ten days. If not returned in that time, an are produced by misplaced confidence; for additional charge of three cents per bag will be

are produced by misplaced confidence; for "the heart of man is deceitful above all things feb 25—tf C. F. SUTTLE. and desperately wicked;" and he who conceives it otherwise, will have much of his labor unrewarded, and the fruit of it gleaned by those who will prove unworthy of its garnering.

With some, Meanness becomes a habit, and their every act is moved by a desire to overreach all with whom they deal. Such an abandonment of principle is far more common than curable, and it renders a man as unreliable, as it makes him despicable. It is much increased by practice, and inures the thoughts of an iodividual to every little device of cunning to enable him to cheat and deceive, for when he once skill in making a sharp bargain, and rapidly tricks of traffic. It is not long before he rears the foundation of an infamous character; and, after losing his self-respect, appeals for credence, to the lowest passions to give food to that appetite which a vile nature fosters to bring all superiority to its filthy level. The perpetration of the various acts of meanness, makes him the plague spot of his community, and, however well his adroitness may keep him affoat upon the current of the bustle of the day, he is marked and shunned by all who know him; for his very presence excites conknow him; for his very presence excites contempt, and when the eye meets his form, his abominable acts present themselves, like a map, to the mind. He is ever consistent with his traits, and will peril a great deal of personal comfort to perform a despicable deed, or to betray those whom he cannot cheat; for a singular fascination impels him to the most disgusting intrigues against those who excite his envy, and, remarkable as it may appear, he is encouraged to a great extent, by that perversity of life which leads many to delight more in White Shirts. Socks and Gloves. of life which leads many to delight more in bearing of the ruin and disgrace of their opponents in business, than in their honor and

Such are some of the evidences of Meanness; and as all men are sordid to a greater or less degree, the wisest conservatism is that which benleates the necessity of throwing around all which law indicates as the proper means to insure ers is called. one man against being wronged or deceived by another; for when Meanness has the advantage in a transaction, it is not apt to recognise any of the restraints of honor, and self-love ever delights in succeeding beyond its expectations in whatever it undertakes. Therefore, it behooves every one to measure his pursuit by brances and precision in order to leave no margin to tempt mercenary motives to practice those acts which render a man's name odious to all the impulses of rectitude; for the absence of suitable precaution in the dealings of trade, is alone the parent of many of the children of fraud, and propagates those vexations which are so often incident to the common concerns of life. But all are not equally depraved, and the teaching of religion is not entirely lost upon every man. As the seeds cast by the same Fans, all of which will be sold at prices to suit hand, do not always produce perfect plants, so the times, at the precepts of morality do not always ensure many there are who will act sordidly, when real or apparent security invites their evil propensities to a violation of the relations which each should bear towards the other.
